Visual interference and hybrid correspondence:
objects transform and yet remain the same through the artist's irony

Sculptor, designer, and engraver, Axel Gouala loves to use heterogeneous materials and techniques in his practice, giving life to creations that trigger a profound empathy in the viewer. Gouala's art starts from everyday life to lead us into a world made of possibilities, rarefied and full of symbols. The result is pieces that challenge conventions, inviting the audience to reflect on their essence; creations that convey messages full of meaning without putting aside irony and lightness. "An important component that runs through my work," says the artist, "is the desire to share ideas through mockery". Having graduated from the Academy of Fine Arts in Strasbourg, Gouala's education was imbued with a deep bond with artisanal traditions. "I do not hesitate to refer to crafting but I have no intention of creating a dichotomy between artisanal and industrial practice". Indeed, these two souls coexist in his work which is often guided by the materials themselves, by their shapes and peculiarities, transforming both the aesthetic aspect and the practical function of the objects. The artist's creative process is divided into different phases. "I am moved by a creative gaze that contaminates the objects that surround me; I let myself be inspired by them as if they were my lifelong companions." Gouala tries to extract the object from its specific context, focusing on the most generic and often standardized characteristics, those which, as he states, "the observer keeps in his mind" as the most relevant peculiarities from an aesthetic point of view. Gouala's work immerses us in an ephemeral and fantastic universe in which every element is reinterpreted and decontextualized. The wave is no longer in the sea just like the mountain is no longer in the range: through apparently simple interventions, the objects are profoundly modified while remaining completely recognizable. In Totem-Voyage, in a process similar to that of collage, a vacuum cleaner is transformed into a palm tree and the visual interferences between the two objects lead the audience's minds in very different directions, away from the objects' physicality if not for their location in space. "I enjoy exacerbating these links by applying them in hybrid drawings and sculptures in which worlds mix and where integrity merges." The artist emphasizes that his reference to everyday life does not simply aim to highlight its dramatic nature but rather to dismantle its predefined conventions and transform appearances through a playful artistic gesture. In his intent there is no pretense of outlining an exhaustive representation of human life: rather, Gouala directs his art to mirror everyday life, the anxieties and stress that permeate us all.

Unidentified Domestic Object (translated from french)

Axel Gouala comes from a dual culture that pushes him to take a dual view of things. The innocuous objects he presents in the exhibition are removed not only from their context of use but also from their setting. These installations reveal how much our minds associate an object with a universe and how fragile and superficial this determination is. By isolating objects, slightly repurposing them, or associating them differently, Axel Gouala opens new pages, glimpses new worlds in which work and travel coexist, bourgeois and exotic clichés blend, ethnic motifs and impersonal objects merge.

Le Grand Tour / Totem-Voyages

«In my serie of work Le Grand Tour / Totem-Voyages I am trying to bring romanticism back in the fitness room, to make Dresden closer to Miami, to use any object with wheels to really move. Some pieces are inspired by personal story, other not. I am interested by our spaces of work and leisure that are everywhere and nowhere : a palm tree or an office chair belong to two stereotypic places. They could be in any country and are two icons of a global world. Each one need the other to exist : we accept to suffer at work to go in holidays. Work is where space and time are controlled by rules, holidays is supposed to be the opposite. I am merging this two ruled spaces creating new lives for these objects, giving them a second chance to be better.»

Falaise

Falaise è un'opera site-specific che cattura l'immagine di pareti rocciose plasmate da mattoni scolpiti. Questa fusione di costruzione e decostruzione enfatizza le qualità plastiche del materiale, creando un fluire armonioso con il soggetto. Il mattone, originando dalla terra stessa, diventa protagonista. Falaise si configura sia come paesaggio che come rovina ma è anche una visione di viaggio, un intreccio di paesaggi mediterranei, coste bretoni e montagne del Sichuan. L'idea nasce dalla materia stessa, il mattone alveolare, osservato durante i miei viaggi in America, Asia, Cina e Africa. Questo materiale estratto dalla terra crea un ciclo creativo: dall'estrazione nasce un negativo, che io trasformo in positivo e poi nuovamente in negativo. Inizialmente concepito come un modello, è poi stato realizzato su larga scala. Falaise è un'ode alla connessione tra materia e terra, un viaggio ciclico che prende forma attraverso l'arte.

Falaise is a site-specific piece that captures the image of rock walls shaped by sculpted bricks. This fusion of construction and deconstruction emphasizes the plastic qualities of the material, creating a harmonious flow with the subject. Brick, originating from the Earth itself, thus become the protagonists of the piece, making it appear both as a landscape and as a ruin but also a travel vision, a mix of Mediterranean landscapes, Breton coasts, and Sichuan mountains. The idea comes from the material itself - the honeycomb brick - observed during my travels. This material, extracted from the earth, creates a creative cycle: from the extraction a negative is born, which I transform into positive and then back into negative. Initially conceived as a model, it was then realized on a large scale. Falaise is an ode to the connection between matter and earth, a cyclical journey that takes shape through art.

Metamorphic Parody

Hidden behind the three thick roots of the Aristotelian poetic genres' family tree; the tragedy, comedy and the epic, one finds their often-forgotten sibling, the parody.

Scarcely addressed by Aristotle himself, at least in the surviving literature, the French literary critic Gérard Genette sat out to reclaim the parody into the literary fold with his 1982 seminal work Palimpsests: La Littérature au second degré. Genette presupposes two modes of production that engenders parody, namely imitation and transformation, and it is the latter which seems to best describe the process behind Axel Gouala's metamorphic sculptural objects. Where Ulysses recalls the Odyssey, or plaster copies their marble originals, Gouala humorously transforms materials much more familiar to the denizens of the 21st century: Plungers playing palms, palms playing coatracks, a mop turned snake slithering away from its bucket. It is precisely the intimacy with which we greet these familiar materials and made-to-be-held design objects that makes the viewing of Gouala's works an almost haptic affair.

Here, one may paraphrase Walter Benjamin's Einbahnstraße (1928), that reading a text compared to copying it, is what flying over a landscape is to walking its streets. Gouala's transformative copying not only echoes the metaphor, but seemingly translates it into the literal in his exhibit Copyshop, Atlas Mnemosyne. For the polystyrene onto which Gouala has carved details from classical cast copies found in the Bode Museum and the Neues Museum, was collected from the streets by the artist, and subsequently returned to them in the window-display on Künstlerhaus Bethanien's ground floor. Since one must only have unpacked a television or stereo set to judge the weight and feel of the polystyrene replica, or what it would take to snap it in half for that matter, curious passersby walking down Kottbusser Straße during the latter months of 2020 were themselves invited to tactilely take part in an unfolding copying and transformation of classical sculpture and philistine design – freed from the vantage of the museum.

Géométrie du Feu

[translated from French]

The geometry of fire describes the insatiable desire to capture and transcribe a form in constant transformation. It is the irreducible element of wildness that resists the perpetual urge to domesticate. The image of a fire in a fireplace or stove recalls that of an animal in a cage. It is a fierce form of life that shares our habitat, yet it is also the first tool of comfort and domestication; it allowed us to tame light and space. It gave our homes the name “hearth.” Despite the path we have walked alongside it, fire has preserved its original and incorruptible beauty. There will never be a precise geometry of fire. It is this imperishable degree of wildness that I seek to unearth from our everyday lives—and, if possible, to blur the boundaries of an overly defined comfort zone.
